What inspired you to dedicate your life to helping people and organizations unleash their potential?

As a kid growing up I always envisioned myself becoming a college basketball coach. There was something about being able to take a group of people from different backgrounds, with different skill sets, driver and traits that always appealed to me. The basketball thing didn't work out and I found myself in pharmaceutical sales and quickly realized the quickest way to success was truly understanding customers and what made them tick. This led to me doing sales development and a stint as the Global Leadership Development Director at RB. I also spent time in a large organizational consulting firm, Korn Ferry, where I realized that my insights about what makes great sales people and more importantly leaders is the same no matter the industry or company you are working with. The key is in helping people leverage the best of who they are and allowing those around them to do the same.

What advice would you give new leaders?

Find the power in what other see as mundane. The great leaders are the ones who glean meaning, lessons and stories from the everyday. Leaders who transform industries are the ones who are able to connect dots of what most people view as day to day tasks or unrelated items and craft them into transformative ideas or visions.

It's such a fabulous way to express the need we all have for human connection, empathy and vulnerability that shouldn't be lost on leaders.
